Topic: Literature | Words: 899 Pages: 3

The nature of war is excruciatingly difficult to understand, being both disturbingly simplistic in its raw violence and unbearably complicated in the multitude of lives that it consumes and the intricate emotional responses that people build toward it. The Vietnam War is one of the best – or, to be more accurate, worst – examples of the described concept, having ruined the lives of thousands of people and leaving disturbing aftermath of confusion and community trauma. In his collection of stories about the Vietnam War, “The Things They Carried,” Tim O’Brien examines the complex relationships between the personal perceptions of the people entangled in it and the nature of the Vietnam War, creating a vignette of snippets of life as they are told through the lens of soldiers. The titular story, “The Things They Carried” addresses the themes of alienation and perception as the key phenomena shaped by the Vietnam War within American society by emphasizing the uncompromising attitudes of the protagonist, which cause a rise in alienation as experienced by the lead character, Norman, and the subsequent change in perception.

The increase in alienation becomes apparent in the novel from the very moment when Norman. The leading character of the story enters the scene. Depicting his return to now peaceful American society, the narrative paints Norman as tremendously damaged by the war to the point where he is incapable of adjusting to the reality of everyday life (Mahini et al. 1284). Thus, the process of alienation begins, being incited not by the harshness and the lack of understanding within the community, but by the war itself. In fact, the very name “Norman”
