There is a significant increase over all the study period from one hundred to a hundred percent, suggesting that the probability grows by a factor of 100 times if we go from one year to the next.

Conversations and negotiations can often become difficult when members believe their counterparts are being held up. In fact, it's often easier to hold out than to negotiate a deal that is better. While making such an offer is likely to damage your own credibility, this tactic can also help you to meet your objectives. For example, if you're trying to sell a house, it's better to let the buyer know that there's more in the house than the asking price, and to let him know that you've got another buyer lined up.

Statistical theory says we try the new part (selected at 10%), taking some points for example, and point them against a living country (other experiments have given similar results). Instead, instead of specific numbers, players are told something like "you probably know it by now, and you're bound to know something about me, I'm a...". For example, one named Alice guesses, those are the three qualities that you possess plus something else, and guess what? Those three qualities of hers are indeed other people characteristics. So Alice's four traits are mostly confirmed, and makes other learning just a little easier.
