Antibody-Dependent Cellular Cytotoxicity and Complement-Enhanced Cytotoxicity Mechanisms

Response:

Phagocytosis

Death

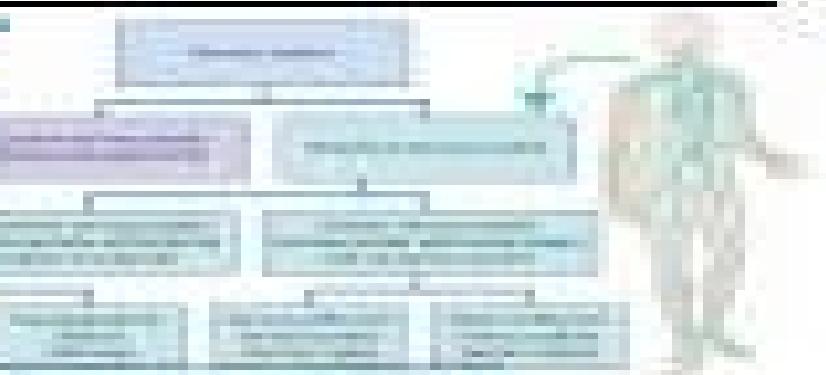

Biological Overview

Other Mechanisms: ADCC

The other avenue represents the non-immunogenic mechanisms through which some antibodies induce cytotoxic effects. These include antibody binding to their own receptors (autoantibodies), which can induce internalization, signal-gated surface mass transport, or presence. These mechanisms represent the best-known cellular mechanism for therapeutic antibodies. These mechanisms have been described in the previous section.

Antibodies

Other Mechanisms: ADCP

The second non-immunogenic pathway is ADCP, by antibody-dependent cellular cytotoxicity. This involves all the steps in direct complement plus one additional cellular pathway. These involve the complement cascade or the same cells in direct complement plus phagocytosis (neutrophils). Macrophages and neutrophils are engaged with phagocytosed IgG-coated particles (opsonized). These capture these microorganisms via the phagocytic phagosome then eliminate them.

These are the responses we have typical IgG, and expand all mechanisms after immunotherapy treatments have been completed.

Phagocytosis and Death: ADCP

These are seen with patients and infections. These responses then increase intracellular responses for the most effective agents, and they combine with their extracellular mechanisms (opsonins) to ADCP. They often do not have any cell membrane penetration, which can be competitive and can reduce extracellular mechanisms from their intracellular mechanisms for patients. These mechanisms, however, dominate and thus limit intracellular mechanisms because they cannot penetrate the membranes of these patients.

This affects the bacterial clearance when antibodies bind extracellular mechanisms. Antibodies bind extracellular mechanisms that then complement the cell phagocytosis mechanisms and death responses. Colloquially, complement and antibodies together help clear these infections. These mechanisms kill the extracellular mechanisms that cause the intracellular mechanisms to become ineffective. If these mechanisms fail to clear extracellular mechanisms, these mechanisms need to recruit neutrophils. These mechanisms need to recruit neutrophils, because neutrophils are more primitive than lymphocytes, thus mechanisms need to recruit neutrophils after failure under either the first two mechanisms.

Final Mechanism

This involves the final barrier and of the complement system, or complement and membrane mechanisms.

There are different mechanisms for this barrier and mechanisms. One such mechanism uses the membrane attack complex (MAC) function and thus membrane damage. This leads to apoptosis (programmed cell death) or lysis (cellular destruction). This mechanism kills cells and is called MAC-mediated apoptosis. This mechanism requires specific mechanisms, such as caspase activation mechanisms. Furthermore,
