

State Government: Sound Familiar?

State governments work almost exactly like the federal government. There are three branches of government: an executive branch, a legislative branch, and a judicial branch. At the state level, the head of the executive branch is called the governor. Every state except one also has a bicameral legislature, meaning that the legislature is made up of two chambers. In most states, those chambers are called the Senate and the House of Representatives. A state's judicial branch normally includes a high court, often called the Supreme Court, and a system of lower courts. These lower courts include trial courts and appeals courts.

A state's three branches interact just like the three branches at the federal level. The purpose of having three branches is to balance power so that no one branch or person becomes too powerful. The state's legislature passes laws. A state's governor can veto laws that are passed, and a state's high court has the power to decide whether state laws violate the state's constitution.

Many state legislatures have outgrown their historic buildings, such as this state capitol building in Arizona.

The State Executive Branch

The head of a state's executive branch is the state governor. The governor is like the "president" of a state and has similar powers, such as the power to veto bills passed by the state's legislature. A state's executive branch also includes many departments. States usually have their own departments of education, transportation, health, and other services. These departments carry out the laws passed by the state's legislature.

The State Legislative Branch

The state legislature is the state's lawmaking body. The state's legislators are the state's lawmakers. Each state is divided into legislative districts that contain roughly the same number of citizens. Citizens in each district elect representatives to serve in the state legislature. That means the state legislators represent the citizens who live in their district. This way, the interests of people in different parts of the state can be represented when state laws are being considered.

Nebraska's Unicameral Legislature

Nebraska is the only state whose legislature has one chamber, not two. Instead of having a Senate and a House of Representatives, Nebraska's legislature just has one group of representatives that does all the lawmaking.

Governors from each state belong to the National Governors Association and meet twice each year to discuss issues that affect all states.

The State Judicial Branch

At the state level, like the federal level, cases start in a trial court. In many states, the trial-court level is called the superior court. States also have appeals courts where people can fight a trial court's ruling. And, of course, every state has a high court. A state's high court reviews the decisions made by lower courts, supervises the other courts, and interprets the state constitution as it applies to the law. State judicial branches also include a level of courts below the trial courts. These courts handle the thousands of smaller issues that come up every day, such as traffic tickets and minor crimes called misdemeanors.
