Suzanne K. Fish and Paul R. Fish

Hot, dry regions of the world have produced some of the most memorable preindustrial civilizations, and the southern deserts of Arizona are no exception. The aptly named modern Phoenix, now the fifth largest city in the United States, arose not from the ashes but from the ruins of what was the most populous and agriculturally productive valley in the West before 1500 ce. When the early Southwestern archaeologist Frank Hamilton Cushing entered this Salt River valley in 1892, he climbed atop an earthen monument in what would become urban Phoenix and exclaimed at the discovery of "one of the most extensive ancient settlements we had yet seen.... Before us, toward the north, east, and south, a long series of...house mounds, lay stretched out in seemingly endless succession" (fig. 1.2). Entrepreneurs arriving from the eastern United States a few decades earlier had, like Cushing, seen not only house mounds but also the former courses of the most massive canals ever built in the pre-Columbian Americas north of Peru (fig. 1.2; plate 20). They soon reestablished large-scale irrigation by laying out new canals virtually in the footprints of the prehistoric ones, triggering the growth of the future city.

Figure 1.2. Centuries of weathering reduced Hohokam adobe buildings to low "house mounds" of earth. When excavated, the mounds often reveal well-preserved outlines of walls, as in this compound at Casa Grande National Monument excavated in 1908.

Irrigation in Early States Stephanie Rost, 2022-06-30 Irrigation has long been of interest in the study of the past Many early civilizations were located in river valleys and irrigation was of great economic importance for many early states because of the key role it played in producing an agricultural surplus which was the main source of wealth and the basis of political power for the elites who controlled it Agricultural surplus was also necessary to maintain the very features of statehood such as urbanism full time labor specialization state institutions and status hierarchy Yet the presence of large scale or complex irrigation systems does not necessarily mean that they were under centralized control While some early states organized the construction operation and maintenance of irrigation works and resolved conflicts related to water distribution other early governments left most of the management to local farmers and controlled only the surplus The cross cultural studies in this volume reexamine the role of irrigation in early states Ranging geographically from South America and the southwestern United States to North Africa the Middle East and Asia they describe the physical attributes and environments of early irrigation systems various methods for empirical investigation of ancient irrigation and irrigation's economic sociopolitical and cosmological dimensions Through their interdisciplinary perspectives the authors all experts in the field of irrigation studies advance both methodological and theoretical approaches to understanding irrigation in early civilizations
