Abstract

Abstract The 1991–1992 season was characterized by a high incidence of influenza A virus infections in the United States. The purpose of this study was to determine whether the 1991–1992 season was unusual in terms of the proportion of influenza A virus infections caused by influenza A virus subtypes H3N2 and H1N1. Data were obtained from the National Influenza Surveillance System, which monitors influenza activity in the United States. The proportion of influenza A virus infections caused by influenza A virus subtypes H3N2 and H1N1 was compared for the 1991–1992 season with the proportions for the 1989–1990, 1990–1991, and 1992–1993 seasons. The proportion of influenza A virus infections caused by influenza A virus subtypes H3N2 was significantly higher in the 1991–1992 season than in the 1989–1990, 1990–1991, and 1992–1993 seasons. The proportion of influenza A virus infections caused by influenza A virus subtypes H1N1 was significantly lower in the 1991–1992 season than in the 1989–1990, 1990–1991, and 1992–1993 seasons. These findings suggest that the 1991–1992 season was unusual in terms of the proportion of influenza A virus infections caused by influenza A virus subtypes H3N2 and H1N1.

Abstract—This study examined the impact of the 1996 U.S. federal ban on the importation of pharmaceuticals from foreign countries on the retail prices of pharmaceuticals in the United States. The study used a difference-in-differences design to compare the change in retail prices of pharmaceuticals imported from foreign countries to the change in retail prices of pharmaceuticals not imported from foreign countries. The results showed that the ban had a significant negative impact on the retail prices of pharmaceuticals imported from foreign countries, but it had no significant impact on the retail prices of pharmaceuticals not imported from foreign countries. The results also showed that the ban had a significant negative impact on the retail prices of pharmaceuticals imported from foreign countries in the United States, but it had no significant impact on the retail prices of pharmaceuticals not imported from foreign countries in the United States. The results suggest that the ban on the importation of pharmaceuticals from foreign countries may have a significant impact on the retail prices of pharmaceuticals in the United States, but it may not have a significant impact on the retail prices of pharmaceuticals not imported from foreign countries in the United States.
