

Populism: Ideology, political style, mentality?¹

MARCO TARCHI²

Abstract

The difficulties of defining the essence of populism and of circumscribing the range of application of this concept have determined a long-lasting controversy in the academic field. Among the main subjects under discussion, one question has arisen most frequently: can populism be considered as an ideology (a “thin” ideology, in Freedman’s sense) or must it be reduced to a political style which can be attached to any ideological background? Referring to the notion elaborated by Juan Linz in order to distinguish authoritarianism from totalitarianism, and on the basis of the empirical evidence, we suggest that populism must be seen neither as an ideology nor only as a style, but as a mentality, connected to a vision of the social order that is based on a belief in the innate virtues of the people, whose primacy is claimed as the source of the legitimacy for government.

It was stressed that populism occurred from time to time in various guises, expressed through movements, regimes, discursive styles and rhetorical strategies, states of mind and psychological behaviours; as such, the literature stressed its chameleon-like ability (Taggart 2000) to adapt to a wide variety of contexts, overstepping the usual dividing line between left and right. In reaction to the various exhortations to redefine the
