

JEAN-PAUL SARTRE

What is Literature?

INTRODUCTION BY DAVID GAUTE

... calls me pigeonhole, which is much more evidence of the highest insult. An author who barely crawled from one war to the other and whose name sometimes awakens languishing memories in old men accuses me of not being concerned with immortality; he forgets, thank God, any number of people whose chief hope it is. In the eyes of an American hack-journalist the trouble with me is that I have not read Bergson or Freud; as for Flaubert, who did not commit himself, it seems that he haunts me like a horse. Smart-alecks wink at me, 'And poetry? And painting? And music? You want to go to the moon?' And some martial spirits demand, 'What's in it about? Commitment in literature? Well, it's the old socialist realism, unless it's a revival of populism, only more aggressive.'

What nonsense. They read quickly, badly, and pass judgement before they have understood. So let's begin all over again. This doesn't amuse anyone, neither you nor me. But we have to hit the nail on the head. And since critics condemn me in the name of literature without ever saying what they mean by that, the best answer to give them is to examine the art of writing without prejudice. What is writing? Why do we write? For whom? The answer seems that not only do we write for ourselves but also for others.
