

How to Prepare a Speech

Speeches generally have 3 purposes. They can persuade, inform, and entertain. Consider your topic and your audience to determine your purpose. Plan your speech by finding a quiet workspace, with no distractions, and follow these steps in order:

1. Set a purpose
2. Select the main ideas
3. Provide supporting material
4. Plan the introduction
5. Prepare a conclusion
6. Prepare an outline

➤ Persuasive speeches should focus on the principle reasons for the desired belief or action.

Informative speeches should answer the questions of who? what? where? when?

Entertaining speeches should have the subject divided into main ideas that can be explained in detail.

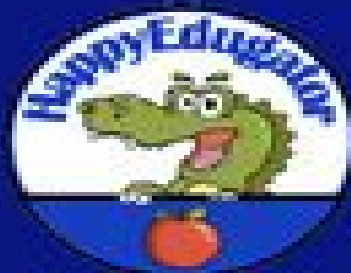

Supporting material should be provided for each main idea, and then provide supporting material. This could be things such as stories, examples, testimonies, statistics, charts, diagrams, slides, samples, models and other visual aids. The selection of the main ideas and supporting material completes the body of the speech.

Next, you want to introduce your speech. You should write the introduction. You should have the body of the speech complete. The introduction needs an attention grabber to engage the audience. A hook can be a statistic, a question, an anecdote, a metaphor, or anything that will entice the audience to listen. Follow with the specific purpose where you tell your audience your reason for giving the speech. List the main points briefly by giving your audience a lot of what you are going to say.

Finally, write your conclusion. In persuasive speeches, the conclusion should combine a summary with a final appeal to the audience to accept the arguments being offered. This is the "call to action." In informative speeches, the conclusion should be just a summary of the main idea and the specific purpose. Entertaining speeches usually end on a point of great amusement, or punch line, and generally without any type of formal conclusion.

Once you have all the parts of your speech written down, prepare an outline to use as you deliver your talk. You can write your outline on paper or use index cards. The main thing to know is that do don't want to read a speech. You want it to come naturally by addressing the points from an outline or note cards.
