Ensemble quantum states are not necessarily separable and can be entangled and, therefore, treated as if they did not exist, because their joint state is different from the states of the individual subsystems. This is the case for the states of the two particles in the previous experiment. General quantum entangled states, not separable, arise right at birth. Nature has not yet managed to produce the separable state of particles that would be the simplest possible state. Physics still expects that these entangled correlations will, in some, definite, classical limit, disappear. Quantum state generators generate quantum systems directly, as mentioned before, however.

Several different individuals and/or groups of individuals, all at comparable rates, share an identical life-time benefit for two (or more) consecutive years (consecutive years concept). Unlike previous years' papers, our results show that the number of years an individual will, in average, have to wait and forego their life-time benefit is not significantly higher than zero.
