

TABLE 1.

Myths Surrounding Children and Grief^{1,3,5}

Misconceptions	Truth and Facts about Grief
Young children do not grieve; they do not understand what has happened.	All children grieve; even the very young know when those around them are upset.
Children must be protected from suffering, loss, and pain to maintain their innocence.	All children experience loss and need help in learning ways to deal with it; children cannot be isolated or protected from death in play, in the media, or in real-life experiences.
Children will be bewildered by being with a loved one who is dying.	The experience will help a child understand and make sense of their experience; nothing is being hidden from them. They can learn that dying and death are a part of life.
Children are traumatized by their last encounters with a dying person.	Children will value the opportunity to spend time with their loved one during his or her last days and weeks.
Encourage only good memories; happy times will be overshadowed by the experience of watching a loved one die; getting rid of reminders of the death helps.	Children can learn through their participation in the death of a loved one; they will feel nothing was hidden from them. It is not wrong to think about the person who died or to have bad memories. Memories about the death process are part of the grief process.
Children should be protected from seeing a loved one die; going to the funeral would just upset them.	Not being included in family rituals could be more upsetting. It helps to see how adults grieve; children may resent their exclusion. Their involvement will assist with grieving.
Adults know better about whether or not to allow a child to participate in a funeral.	Children can benefit from helping to plan and by attending the funeral, including allowing them opportunities for questions and learning from the emotional reaction of adults. They can benefit from the support of others displayed at funerals to help overcome feelings of isolation. Forcing a child to participate against their will, or from excluding those wishing to be included, can cause difficulty.
Children do not feel grief the same or as much as adults.	Everyone grieves in his or her own way depending on circumstances, developmental level, and life experiences. Expression of grief may be different but still as intense. This is healthy and usual.
Once a child is angry or shows guilt, that should be the end of it.	Grief is a process, not steps; the same feelings may resurface repeatedly, as each aspect of loss is realized.
It is morbid to want to touch or talk about the body.	This is normal for children. It is a good way to say "goodbye" and make death real.
When they have grieved once, it should be over; children can resolve grief quickly.	As they develop, children must re-grieve losses in light of new understanding and abilities; grief has no time limits.
Adults must be in control around children, and must say the right thing.	There are no right answers, only honest ones. Saying something acknowledges a child's grief and dispels fears and misunderstandings.
Use terms like "passed away" and "gone to heaven."	These are misleading for children and may confuse or frighten them. "Dead" and "dying" are better.
Children do not want to talk about their loss. Don't mention the death unless they do.	By not bringing the death up, it suggests that it is wrong to mention the person who died, that there is something bad about them or their death, and that no one cares. Children can decide if they wish to talk about the death with someone; the opportunity must be open and available. Often, the death is all they want to talk about. Teens may want to talk with a non-parent.
Talking about death will upset a child.	They are already upset; this is a normal part of the grieving process.
