The cross-sectional regressions are more informative than longitudinal regressions in this case since they can compare different groups' performances. The cross-sectional regressions show that family, if the same percentage holds at both time points, has no effect on performance. Thus, availability, energy, social support, information, social gain, and the other components have no effect. The effects of benzodiazepine receptor antagonists and psychostimulants on performance, however, are not always as straightforward as they appear. In addition to their sedative properties, benzodiazepines also have anxiolytic and anti-convulsive properties. These properties limit the performance-enhancing effect of benzodiazepines on memory tasks by the reduction of anxiety and excitability. It has been shown that the more benzodiazepines ingested, the greater the reduction in cognitive function becomes. These cognitive functions include memory, attention, language, and problem-solving abilities. The exact mechanism by which benzodiazepines affect cognitive function is not fully understood, but it is believed that they may interfere with the transmission of neurotransmitters such as GABA and glutamate.
