The U.S. Intrepid NCC-1701-B was a variant of the Excelsior class, the designed from the original design. In several important respects—most obviously, the saucer section was fitted with two additional impulse engines (doubling the total to four). This was a response to the disappointing speeds achieved by the Excelsior's saucer when it was separated from the secondary hull. The other major difference involved moving the decks at the bottom of the engineering hull under to provide additional life space and armor capacity.

Despite its troubled beginnings as the test bed for Starfleet's fleet training experiments at the 128th, the Excelsior class was one of the Federation's most successful starship designs. The fundamental engineering principles behind the class of ships drew heavily on the innovations developed by Engineering Captain Montgomery Scott during his revolutionary work on the upgrade of the Constitution-class. It became clear to Starfleet that the ideas that were being developed could be further explored in an entirely new class of ship and this led them to start work on the Excelsior. The final design proved remarkably flexible and allowed room for the next evolution.

Initially the Intrepid-B was a standard Excelsior-class ship. The four D2 decks, with the main bridge on Deck 1, at the top of the saucer section, and Deck 30—where armistice was both generated and stored—at the bottom of the secondary hull.

The saucer section provided almost all of the ship's living quarters, with the majority of the officers being located on Deck 8. The main sickbay was on Deck 6, at the distal center of the saucer, ensuring that it was one of the safest locations on the ship. In her original arrangement, crew compartments had to share quarters, but this was subsequently reconfigured to provide each crewmember with more living space for deep-space exploration missions. This was considered necessary given the extended periods that the crew had to spend on board ship.

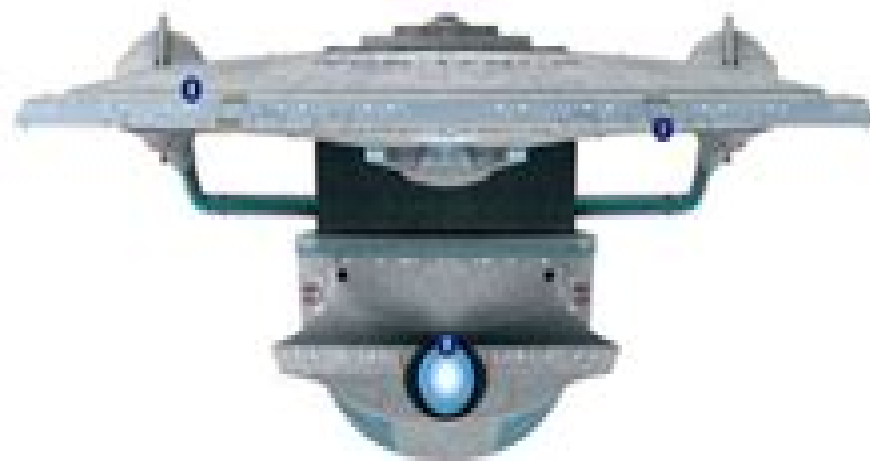

When she launched, the Intrepid-B was one of the fastest and most technologically advanced ships in the fleet. She was only the 19th Excelsior-class ship to enter service.

In a design refinement carried over from the Excelsior prototype the warp core was positioned
