

ACADEMICS' BOOK SUGGESTS POTENTIAL BENEFITS OF RECYCLING WASTE FOR CONSTRUCTION USE

Prof Tshwalo Motaung, Head of the Department of Chemistry, and Dr Linda Linganiso, lecturer in the Department of Chemistry.

Two academics from the Department of Chemistry at the University of Zululand (UNIZULU) have published an academic book that analyses the current waste management challenges in the country and proposes potential solutions that can have a positive spin for the construction industry.

Waste-to-Profit Volume 2 was published in June and is authored by Dr Linda Linganiso and Professor Tshwalo Motaung. It is a continuation of the first volume which Dr Linganiso authored. The first volume, published in March 2018, investigated the various methods of adding value to waste products in order to generate wealth for a sustainable economy. It also highlighted the then policies and regulations to fast-track the development of new technologies for bio-projects in the countries of focus while also discussing opportunities, barriers and policy implications.

The second volume, as Prof Motaung describes it, is a summation of research and literature review conducted by the two authors in the area of waste management. It suggests ways of bridging the gap between waste management and the construction sector by discussing the potential methods of recycling the increasing volumes of solid waste into construction products that can be in demand both locally and internationally. In so doing, a circular economy could be created in the construction industry.

"The South African economy is generally linear, hence most solid products post usage become a pile of waste- be it organic or not. Once it becomes waste, very little is attempted to manage it yet there are some potential opportunities to add value to the waste. The recommendations in the book support the internationally adopted program of a circular economy in the construction sector. The book is exploring the possible solutions and it goes on to encourage entrepreneurship in the waste stream. It also supports the transition to a low carbon economy. Different types of materials which can be produced from the construction
