So remember that you understand and master the method of brewing green tea. Read on to find out how to make green tea that will rejuvenate and improve your body. But first, let me tell you a little bit about green tea. The practice of drinking green tea dates back to the Chinese. Legend has it that the Emperor of China in 2737 BC when a few tea tree leaves fell into his cup of boiled water. Later Chinese monks started drinking green tea for their health. The health benefits of tea would fit in travel to India and other places to spread Buddhism and the tea miracle drink with them. Thereafter, green tea gained popularity. Green tea, Camellia sinensis, is a native plant to China. The green, black, and oolong teas come from the same plant. Camellia sinensis green tea leaves have to be kept dry for a long time. The tea pickers harvest the fresh leaves from the apex. The leaves are then processed in a way that prevents too much oxidation. And this is the key to processing raw tea that makes green tea not oxidize. The green tea from China has a long history, whereas the green tea from America is a recent development. However, both have health benefits. Green tea, Camellia sinensis, is an unfermented tea. The traditional method of processing green tea involves withering, then rolling, then drying. It has many health benefits, including anti-irritation and cellulite reducing. Raw tea has a high antioxidant content. Green tea also reduces weight loss supplements, not to mention the metabolic resting rate and the risk of heart disease. In North America, determining the benefits of tea is a matter of marketing. Most of the supplementation with green tea is done with the healthiest type of tea, and to prevent cardiovascular disease, including Alzheimer's. Green tea, when consumed, has health benefits.
