

Elastic Forces and Hooke's Law

Many systems that exhibit elastic behavior only have their good approximations (ideal perfect systems) as described by Hooke's Law. The list of such systems is very long and varied – an elastic pendulum, a piston within gas that undergoes changes in temperature (pressure), the gas in a hydraulic pump or brake, and numerous cellular components and processes. Some including cells, most of which are made up of fluids. Processes that involve the hydrodynamics and mechanics of fluids (like a spring system) are also considered. Interestingly, the force required to stretch (or compress) a particular elastic system (conditions must provide information about the temperature, pressure, etc.) is not the same. Therefore, a more sophisticated or spring can be an example of a system that does not fit Hooke's Law.

Objectives

1. The test Hooke's Law by measuring the spring constant of a spring.
2. The test whether a particular system obeys Hooke's Law.
3. Explain the limits of the validity of Hooke's Law.

Introduction

A spring, when stretched or compressed by applied force, exerts a force that is proportional to the change in length of the spring according to Hooke's Law. (See a limited range of stretching and compression, then the spring is stretched or compressed).

When this stretching or compression is small, the spring is said to obey Hooke's Law:

$$F_{spring} = -kx \quad (1)$$

where k is the spring constant, a characteristic of the "stiffness" of the spring. The x is the displacement from the equilibrium position. The spring force is always in the opposite direction of the displacement. (Note: if the spring is stretched, the displacement is positive and the spring force is negative; if the spring is compressed, the displacement is negative and the spring force is positive.) This is the opposite of the spring force. It is not Hooke's Law. A graph of the F_{spring} versus x is a straight line passing through the origin and the slope of the line is the spring constant.

When a mass is hung on a vertical spring, the weight of the mass stretches the spring down, so:

$$mg = kx \quad (2)$$

where m is the mass of the spring and g is the acceleration of gravity (down). This relationship of Eq. (2) allows us to determine the spring constant k of a spring by measuring the mass m and the displacement x .
