

Evacuation in World War 2

When the war started in 1939, the government was concerned about people in the cities, ports and those living near the enemy's targets (such as factories or airfields) being killed by possible bombings, so evacuation was introduced to try and make people as safe as possible.

It was mainly children who were evacuated but some other groups of people were evacuated too, like schoolteachers, mothers with children under five years old and some disabled people. The British evacuation was named 'Operation Pied Piper' and began on Friday 1st September 1939.

Children help to clear land after the bombing to plant vegetable seeds.

The idea behind evacuation was to send children out of the dangerous cities where bombs were more likely to fall and to take them to live with host families in the country where they would be safer. Thousands were sent from the crowded streets of London to quieter parts of the country. Areas such as Devon and Cornwall were considered safe as they were far from Europe and had few big towns. Evacuation was not compulsory, but it was a free scheme set up by the government which millions of families took advantage of as they were so worried about being bombed.

If the government decided that an area was at risk, a letter was sent to parents explaining that their child could be evacuated if they wished and that parents were allowed to go if they were able. Families had to make the hard decision to split up for a long period of time with contact by letter as the only possible means of communication. Few families had telephones at the time, so there was no way of speaking to their parents whilst they were away.

Children also had to take their gas mask, ration book, identity card and clothing coupons as well as a suitcase or bag of essential clothes. Lists of essential clothes were published by the government and included just the absolute basics.

The houses that were chosen for evacuees to live in were called 'billets' and it was the job of the billeting officer to find a home for all the evacuees. Offering evacuees a home was considered to be national service and anyone who refused to house evacuees with no good reason could be fined. Some hosts did not have experience of looking after children, for others it was a real squash to fit more children into their home. Host families were given some money each week to help feed and care for the children they took in, as many
