

The Role Of Fear In The Crucible

Fear is capable of making the irrational rational because of the lack of control that someone may have on himself. Fear is capable of making people do anything to make it go away. Even the most unjustifiable acts can seem reasonable in the moment. In Arthur Miller's play The Crucible fear is used as a weapon among the character as the accusations of witchcraft increase in the town. Abigail, the antagonist, manipulates the people of Salem to save herself. She uses her affair with John Proctor as a weapon against him. It is up to Proctor to either expose Abigail or to keep silent to save his reputation. Throughout the play, John Proctor is in constant fear of himself because of the way the sins affect him and the town.

John Proctor fears that his wife finds out about his affair with Abigail. He doesn't want the truth to come out to light because it can ruin his marriage. It can also ruin his reputation. In the play The Crucible, John says "...But I will cut my hand off before I'll ever reach to you again. Wipe is out of mind. We never touched, Abby." With this quotation, we can see that John Proctor is afraid that Elizabeth finds out that him and Abigail had an affair. He wants Abigail to act like nothing happened, but she keeps looking for him. Proctor does not want his wife to find out that he committed adultery. He only wants to save his marriage. In Act II, Proctor says, "...I have a good reason to think before I charge fraud on Abigail, and I will think on it." John has a dilemma. He doesn't know whether to accuse Abigail or stay quiet. Proctor is afraid that if he accuses Abigail of witchcraft she'll say something about their affair, his marriage might end. John needs to figure out how to save himself. John's sins have pushed his and Elizabeth's marriage to the edge.
