

and, in turn, influences the degree to which users are able to achieve their goals. The degree of this impact is often determined by the type of the user interface. After extensive efforts in the study of the user interface, designers are beginning to find that human factors greatly impact on the use and success of digital devices. Human factors research is the study of people and their interactions with digital devices (Hollnagel and Woods 1993, Hancock-Beaulieu 1994). For our study, we investigated different kinds of digital devices, the Microsoft Dynamics of year 1 (Hollnagel, Figure 1, Hancock, and Hancock 1993), year 2 (Hollnagel, Figure 2, Hancock, and Hancock 1993), and year 3 (Hollnagel, Figure 3, Hancock, and Hancock 1993) models between 1992 and 1993. In this study, we used a case study to explore the changes in users' perceptions of the use of Microsoft Dynamics of year 1 to year 3. The degree of user's perceived ease of use, the degree to which they agree with statements, and the degree to which they intend to use the system were the dependent variables. Participants were randomly selected from three different companies, namely the Microsoft, the California State University, and the University of California, and the study of the use of the versions of the Dynamics of year 1, year 2, and year 3 was conducted by the researchers.
