

Why did the Union win the Civil War?

The Union victory in the Civil War (1861-1865) is one of the most debated topics in American history and there are a variety of possible interpretations including: military tactics, morale, nationalism, political leadership, economic problems and many more. This essay will only examine the idea of inevitability, James McPherson's theory of contingency, political leadership, the role of black soldiers and issues with the Confederate cause. The essay will argue that while the Union victory was not inevitable, the industrial and economic superiority played an important role after Lincoln's re-election. The theory of contingency is important in pointing out the flaws of the inevitability argument, but it needs to acknowledge that victories on the battlefield required resources and good political leadership on the home front to maintain popular support for the war. While the Union partly owed its success to superiority in men and resources, Lincoln's political leadership and the involvement of black troops significantly contributed to settling the conflict.

When comparing the resources and the population¹ of both the Union and the Confederacy, one might conclude that the Union victory was inevitable and indeed a number of historians including Richard Current have come to this conclusion.² This view, however, is flawed as there are a number of examples in history when inferior forces with poorer resources managed overcome all odds and succeed against larger forces. The Netherlands, for example, managed to gain independence from Spain in 1648 and the extraordinary victory of the Viet Cong in 1975 against the American army encouraged military historians to reconsider the inevitability in the Civil War.³ As historian Hugh Tulloch puts it: "the South's was a high-risk strategy", but the loss was not inevitable.⁴ Initially, indeed, the Confederacy had the advantage of fighting on the defensive, there was hope of foreign intervention and the rebels had higher morale as many men enlisted to defend their homes. The Union, on the other hand, had to invade Confederate territory and it was harder for Lincoln to define the conflict and persuade men to join the army. McPherson's theory of contingency - the

¹ The Union population was 18.5 mill whereas the Confederate population was 5.5 million and 3.5 million were black slaves. The Union had a deposit of $ 234 million (+ $ 29 million from border states), whereas the Confederate deposit was $ 74 million. The Union had 101,000 factories and the Confederacy only had 21,000. The Confederacy did not have the resources to fight a prolonged war. Facts, National Park Service
