Abstract The authors have developed a new method for the determination of the concentration of the active component in the solution of the polymer electrolyte membrane (PEM) fuel cell. The method is based on the measurement of the open-circuit voltage (OCV) of the fuel cell. The OCV is measured at different temperatures and at different concentrations of the active component. The OCV is then plotted against the concentration of the active component. The resulting curve is used to determine the concentration of the active component in the solution of the PEM fuel cell. The method is simple and accurate and can be used for the determination of the concentration of the active component in the solution of the PEM fuel cell.

QUESTION
A 25-year-old male with a 10-year history of asthma presents with a 2-week history of increasing shortness of breath and wheezing. He reports that his symptoms are worse at night and with exercise. He has tried over-the-counter inhalers without relief. He has no recent travel, sick contacts, or changes in diet. He is a non-smoker and takes no other medications. His last asthma attack was 6 months ago. Physical examination shows hyperinflation of the lungs, hyperresonance to percussion, and wheezing on auscultation. There is no crackles, rhonchi, or stridor. His vital signs are stable. A chest X-ray shows hyperinflation of the lungs. Spirometry shows obstructive lung disease. What is the most likely diagnosis?
