Project Hopes to Recreate the Smells of Old Europe

How does the project work?

- There are several little jars hanging in the room which are designed to recreate different smells.
- They help us learn about all the different smells.

Have you ever wondered what things in the past would smell like?

Well, a new project does just that by looking into how to recreate the past through the sense of smell.

A project called 'Scentopia' has been launched. It's all about to make smells from Europe from the past 100 years.

The aim is to help people enjoy history through their nose.

Dr. William Davis, from Temple College, University of Exeter, is the founder of the project. He said, "There is a lot of research on the past, but not on the sense of smell. The sense of smell is one of the most important senses in the past, but it's often overlooked. We want to change that."

They plan to use all the past smells to help you understand the past.

The first step for the project is to create a list of smells from the past. It will be made through research and different fragrances in the past.

It will use research from the past to create a list of smells.

All of the fragrances will help them to create a list of smells from the past. They will use all the past smells to help you understand the past. They hope the smell of the past will help you understand the past. They hope the smell of the past will help you understand the past.

They plan to use all the past smells to help you understand the past. They plan to use all the past smells to help you understand the past. They plan to use all the past smells to help you understand the past.
