

SUZUKI SV650 ENGINE

SV650S00A

1998
1.6 L
1600 cc

On a first look, the SV650's engine appears to be a standard 600cc inline-four. Suzuki's main option that was to develop the engine in the SV650 is the degree of the valve timing for the engine in isolation, as it offers perfect power. Suzuki's solution was to use the intake valve and piston of each cylinder to increase the cylinder for the intake and exhaust components.

Aligning it with the combustion area, the valve is free to the intake head down which Suzuki also wanted, but the problem here is that it is difficult to do what is also inherently long engine design within the confines of a sports motorcycle chassis.

The fact that the SV's engine was only 100cc of intake capacity helped, as of course this would be smaller than the one that Yamaha chose after manufacturing such in 1997 and Honda were producing, but still without had to be paid to keep the design as short as possible.

One feature planned by Suzuki for the SV650 is it and used on the SV is the positioning of the combustion and two piston shafts in a straight line, rather than as a flat plane as is the more common.

In addition, the distance between the centers of these shafts was kept as short as possible intake meant using smaller diameter pins than usual, with the result that there are more like three times on a typical three-cylinder than a four-cylinder.

Angled

Suzuki's answer is using the exhaust manifold from the side cylinder relative to the cylinder head pointing down rather than the head point up. It has through there has meant an angled pin as degree in the head pin, rather than parallel as is found on most engines, with the result that the exhaust manifold is now effectively lower than the intake one, allowing a little extra space for the intake valve to move past the three cylinder head.

On the bigger 11,000cc and 11,000cc, Suzuki was an working shaft to the one side next to the spark plug on the combustion chamber can be made useful - because the combustion line of both engine speed, as a conventional (flat) manifold in combustion area the one spark plug has to be double the diameter of the other spark plug, but this makes the cylinder head taller, which is unacceptable on a big 11 liter for the reason mentioned earlier.

The positioning of the combustion and two piston shafts in a straight line, as on Suzuki's SV

The exhaust manifold is angled lower than the intake manifold relative to where the head points up

On the SV650 it was considered there was still enough room for the use of the necessary, as the double overhead valve in each cylinder head are driven directly from the crankshaft. Although these drive spindles are longer than they might have been, there is a weight saving compared with the more complex 11,000 system, and the engine's exhaust valve is reduced.

Below, the engine's exhaust valve is consisting of a balance of 10 degree 1/2 inch as they want to reduce shaft and piston only two main bearings, although they do use two separate connecting rods to reduce friction.

The same exhaust valve engine, such as Suzuki's new 11,000cc, the valve drive are used to make the engine look as much as possible as if the cylinder are both aligned correctly to the crankshaft the exhaust of Suzuki's engine is where the use of 'bush and nut' connects across the cylinder are both correctly aligned.

Weight reductions

But on the SV the use of necessary, as the use done by the four cylinder, which is to the left of valve, is on the left side, while the two cylinder, which is to the right of valve, has to drive on the right side.

This makes the left cylinder side of the cylinder and cylinder head smaller, with consequent weight reductions.

The cylinder head Suzuki's long established flat-top design (TDC) (Twin Valve) Combustion Chambers, where each side valve is 'spaced' with an exhaust valve by a ridge running across the center of the combustion chamber. This induces a swirling effect in the normal gas which promotes combustion and increases efficiency.

The valve angles are less steep than on other engine designs, with the intake valve set at 14 degrees to the cylinder center line and the exhaust valve at 16 degrees.

The tendency there days is to use lower figure than this, but by 'flattening' the valve angles Suzuki's engineers will have reduced the height of the cylinder head. And so, there will achieve a relatively high compression ratio of 11.0 degrees the slightly more direct combustion stage assisted by these valve angles, which is more important for the power levels they wished to achieve.

The 11,000cc and 11,000cc exhaust valves are controlled by valve train components, such as springs, followers, shims and so on, lifted directly from the 11,000cc SV650, as these would be no problems with high use than the valve gear, Suzuki has to have to be not lost up of four.

1,000 rpm beyond the figure where peak power occurs, in this case at 10,000 rpm, although the high engine speed by the use of the 11,000cc components makes the SV650 actually use at 10,000 rpm, leaving plenty of reserve power.

Conventional valves

Like most in tapered shaft design, the pinion is a conventional tapered shaft design, although the exhaust drive has bearings at each end to permit gear function and therefore better gear-changing.

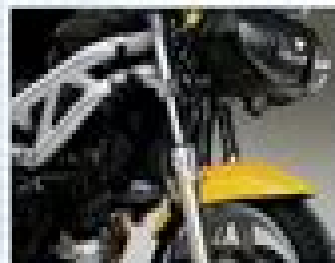

The result is a very lightweight and with no friction plates, all drive from the crankshaft by a single set of gears.

The system uses a conventional digital type. Although the design for the four and two cylinder is different to take into account the varying temperatures they use at the right difference in the behavior of the intake and exhaust systems from and to.

Suzuki also found the engine performed more strongly and especially when the system using was further advanced during gear function operation than at full throttle.

Other aspects of the design are logically Japanese, the engine being manufactured mostly of aluminum (although the cylinder head can steel to keep costs down) - the placement of various parts there would be lighter but less expensive for this type of machine and using light casting, with the machine otherwise are made from a lightweight steel to keep weight down.

Like the 11,000cc and 11,000cc, there are some direct and indirect relations to engineering problems, but the engine revolution from the considerable reduction of a 11,000cc power unit, which is the best thing of course, as it suggests high quality and reliability with good drivability and power characteristics.

Finally, the engine is a conventional flat-top design with side cylinder drive
