This study has no known conflicts of interest related to this research. The issue of whether to differentiate between those working with adults and those with young children, despite numerous similarities in the research, is not the focus of this research. Instead, the research focuses on the similarities between those working with children and those working with adults, despite the differences in the research, which is the focus of this research.

Manuscript writing usually involves writing in many settings. Writing can occur anywhere or almost anywhere and often involves interruptions by the participants, including the writer, who may be interrupted by others. Thus, research on writing for non-traditional settings is a topic that needs to be explored. There is an attempted way of knowing that comes partly from science, but is not science.

Which are consistent in character? There are two correct answers.

- It is consistent in that nothing can cause Thomas to think logically.
- It is true (consistent in being) nothing requires the subject to think rationally and obviously possible consistently.
