1. Introduction The purpose of this study was to investigate the effect of a 12-week resistance training program on the muscle strength and endurance of older adults. The study was conducted in a laboratory setting and involved 20 participants aged 65 and older. The participants were divided into two groups: a control group and an experimental group. The experimental group performed a resistance training program consisting of three sessions per week for 12 weeks. The control group did not perform any resistance training. The primary outcome measures were muscle strength and endurance. The secondary outcome measures were muscle mass and body composition. The results of the study showed that the experimental group had significantly greater muscle strength and endurance compared to the control group at the end of the 12-week program. There were no significant differences in muscle mass and body composition between the two groups. The findings of this study suggest that a 12-week resistance training program can improve muscle strength and endurance in older adults. Further research is needed to determine the long-term effects of resistance training on older adults.
