

Chapter 4 – “The Witch’s Headstone”

SUMMARY

Bob has been wanted to stay away from the overgrown, unkempt graveyard, also called the Poorer’s Field, on the west side of the graveyard. A witch is buried there, along with others who did not qualify for a religious burial.

After Bob finishes his lesson one day during a period of fasting, in spite of his teacher’s efforts, he climbs an apple tree near the edge of the graveyard. A branch breaks, and Bob falls to the ground, turning his ankle. A young woman who is a resident of the Poorer’s Field runs to his aid and tells him her story: that even accused her of being a witch and “discarded and banished and buried” her in the Poorer’s Field. She seems proud to tell Bob that she really was a witch. Although she says she has no headstone, so she “might be anybody,” she introduces herself as Lisa Hengstock.

Bob decides that he will get a headstone for Lisa. Since he doesn’t have enough money to buy one, he goes into the stone burial chamber and takes the bones in spite of the Silver’s initial objections. Bob notices how beautiful the bones’s were and the small-iron urn. He puts on some old clothes left behind in a gardener’s shed and goes “out into the world” to a shop that deals in junk, antiques and precious goods. The owner of the shop, Abnerwig Polger, immediately recognizes the value of the bones. He takes Bob to a back room and calls a friend who can help him push Bob around.

Lisa shows up and realizes Bob needs help. In the shop, Abnerwig mentions a black-edged card with the word “Jack” written on it, along with instructions for summoning the man back. Abnerwig and the other men argue about whether to summon the man back, or to use the key to find more treasure. Lisa explains that Bob’s attempt to take Jack’s work is the just because he’s not dead. She says words over him that finally enable him to rise, noting that, even as a dead witch, she is able to cast the spell because, “we don’t forget.” After looking for Bob and not finding him, Abnerwig and the other men struggle and knock each other out. Bob figures out how to get the key and his himself out of the back room. He leaves the shop with some things he picked up: a paintbrush and a glass paperweight as well as the bones. Lisa tells him to take the black-edged card and Bob says he will give it to Silas.

Silas tells Bob he is in trouble for leaving the graveyard, but accepts the card with interest and asks Bob to tell him all about what happened. Bob tells Silas that Lisa helped him. Bob returns the bones to the burial chamber where the Silver says with satisfaction, “It always comes back.” Finally, Bob paints the beautiful glass paperweight with the letters E.H. and “we don’t forget” and leaves it as a headstone for Lisa.
