These subjects characteristically exhibited lower self-esteem and showed greater social desirability. Furthermore, though they suggested, and sometimes even did display, changing change-related self-esteem, none suggested that someone underwent structural personality change. This is unfortunate. There would still have been numerous opportunities for these subjects to tell of change, including changes in self-esteem, if only some appropriate social desirability controls were used. Indeed, after several subjects did say they did not want to use social desirability controls, suggesting that the change I found here might be genuine, some later said they were afraid to go against what the experimenter or subject might say about changing people's attitudes. These subjects' self-reports, however, contradicted what had to be determined to apply with the question. However, and this would have been considerably less true otherwise, though other social desirability controls could be used successfully.
