Other critics respond by noting that the new system is dominated by the public sector, which has a monopoly of the media. Critics also note that the state controls the media through a system of licensing and funding, maintaining television stations and the print newsprint firms. The new government claims to promote development of private mass-communication facilities, but continues licensing under the former system. Radio Free Africa (1993) also notes opposition to the negative effects of state ownership of broadcasting, which depend heavily on the state-controlled resources. But it claims that the opposition will be frustrated because their goals are more practical and immediate. The freely chosen, voluntarily collected, grassroots-based movements are the only self-organized structures that stand a chance of achieving an amount of freedom of the press that is not subject to the whims of the state. Other scholars also note that the new government is committed to respect rights of thought, action, religion, and expression, in particular. Other scholars claim that the goal is not to free the press but to control it, through a philosophy of social justice. In sum, the difference, according to the authors, between civil society and the state lies in the latter's "ability . . . to use the use of political capital, maintaining the hegemony of political and economic forces. These forces may have a leading role in the new regime in formulating rights or human rights. Otherwise, it is the civil society, and not the state, that is the last line of defense against the state's repression, and not the state's repression, and not the state's repression, and not the state's repression." (1993, p. 100)
