Abstract

After the 1990s, the number of studies on the effects of the environment on the development of children has increased. These studies have been carried out in different areas, such as intelligence, language, and social skills. One of the most important studies in this field was the study by Plomin and Jock MacCoby (1973), which showed that the environment has a significant effect on the development of children. This study was one of the first to show that the environment has a significant effect on the development of children. It was a longitudinal study that followed a group of children from birth to age 18. The study found that the environment has a significant effect on the development of children, particularly in the areas of intelligence, language, and social skills.
