ABSTRACT

We find that individual investors who use technical analysis and trade options frequently make poor portfolio decisions, resulting in dramatically lower returns than other investors. The data on which this claim is based consists of transaction records and matched survey responses of a sample of Dutch discount brokerage clients for the period 2000–2006. Overall, our results indicate that individual investors who report using technical analysis are disproportionately prone to have speculation on short-term stock-market developments as their primary investment objective, hold more concentrated portfolios which they turn over at a higher rate, are less inclined to bet on reversals, choose risk exposures featuring a higher ratio of nonsystematic risk to total risk, engage in more options trading, and earn lower returns.

1. Introduction

The intersection between the literature on individual investors and the literature on technical analysis is sparse. As a result, knowledge about individual investors' use of technical analysis has been limited. In the present paper, we present the ☆ We thank a large online discount broker and its employees for making available the data used in this paper. We thank seminar participants at the University of Münster for valuable feedback on a previous draft of the paper. We thank the journal editor, William Neilson, and the special issue editors, Remco Zwinkels, Martijn van den Assem, and Doron Kliger, for constructive guidance through the review process and helpful feedback. We thank three anonymous reviewers for valuable comments to improve the paper. We thank Jeroen Derwall for technical assistance. Part of the work was completed while Arvid Hoffmann was visiting the Leavey School of Business at Santa Clara University, Aalto University School of Economics, and the Foster School of Business at University of Washington, whose hospitality is gratefully acknowledged. This paper draws on different versions of a working paper that we circulated previously under the titles "Discount Brokerage, Online Trading, and Data Overload: Increased Emphasis on Technical Analysis, Intuition, and Speculation" and "The High Cost of Technical Analysis and Speculation." We subsume these previous versions of the paper in the current version.
