TEK 8.9A: Plate Tectonic Theory Evidence

TEK 8.9A: Describe the historical development of evidence that supports plate tectonic theory.

- Prior to the year 1900, most scientists that studied geology believed that the present position and shape of the Earth's continents changed very little over time. They understood that volcanoes created new mountains or volcanic islands, and erosion wore down older mountains, but believed that the continents themselves were fixed in their present position.
- Scientists in the 1800's had studied rock layers and fossils all over the earth, and had noticed some coincidences they could not explain. For example, similar sequences of sedimentary rock layers, and similar dinosaur fossils, could be found on the opposite sides of the Atlantic Ocean. The east coast of South America, and the west coast of Africa, also had a similar shape.

Wegener's Continental Drift Hypothesis

- A German scientist named Alfred Wegener noticed these and other geologic clues, and came to believe that there was a reason for these coincidences. Starting with the shapes of the continents, Wegener found that all of the continents could be fitted together like jigsaw puzzle pieces. He wondered if in fact all of the continents could have once been a single super-continent.
- Over a number of years in the early 1900's, Wegener assembled geologic evidence that he believed supported his "continental drift hypothesis." His hypothesis stated that the continents drifted across the surface of Earth over time, and that about 200 million years ago all of the continents on Earth were assembled together as a single super-continent that he later called Pangaea. The maps below show his proposed sequence of continental drift over time. He first presented his hypothesis publicly in 1912, and published a book with his hypothesis in 1915.
