Paint Application Guide No. 11

Protecting Corners, Edges, Crevices, and Irregular Steel Geometries by Stripe Coating

1. Scope

1.1 This guide discusses the technique called "stripe coating" or "striping" as a way of providing extra corrosion protection measures on edges, outside corners, crevices, bolt heads, welds, and other irregular steel geometries, including optional techniques that can be used to improve coating performance. It is not intended to provide all-encompassing guidance but rather offer options when preparing a project specification. The engineer should evaluate and address details on a project-specific basis.

1.2 Appendix A contains recommendations and sample language to assist the specification writer in addressing corrosion protection of edges, crevices, and irregular steel geometries, and Appendix B contains representative photographs of configurations or geometries that may benefit from stripe coating.

1.3 Units of Measure: This guide makes use of both the ASTM[®] SI 10, "American National Standard for Metric Practice" International System Units (SI) units and U.S. Customary units. The measurements are not exact equivalents; therefore each system must be used independently of the other, without combining in any way. This guide uses SI units with the U.S. Customary conversions shown in parentheses.

2. Definitions

Bolted Connection: Two or more steel plates connected by a mechanical fastening system consisting of a threaded metal rod or pin (bolt) joined to a metal nut (with or without a washer).

Corner: The intersection of two surfaces.

Crevice: A narrow opening; fissure.

Edge: An exposed, through-thickness surface of a plate or rolled shape created either during the rolling process (for example the as-rolled side face of a beam flange, channel flange or angle leg), or by thermal cutting, sawing, or shearing. Edges may be planar or rounded, and either perpendicular or skewed to adjacent faces.

3. Background

3.1 Sharp edges, outside corners, crevices, and welds are often sites where coating failures and corrosion begin due to reduced coating barrier protection (see Figure 1). Reduced coating thickness on these surfaces can be a result of application of inadequate amounts of coating, but the surface tension of the wet coating or coating shrinkage during the drying/curing process can also pull the film away from edges. Sharp edges resulting from cutting, burning, and shearing are especially difficult to coat adequately. Bolt threads and fastener systems combine the adverse effects of sharp edges and crevices. Crevices, depending on their inherent width, are also difficult to protect using coatings. Wet coating may flow over rather than into tight crevices, creating a temporary bridge over the crevice that opens as the coating cures and shrinks, thus leaving the crevice interior unprotected. In this case caulking is oftentimes a better alternative. All of these irregular geometries are susceptible to premature corrosion.

3.2 A "stripe coat" is a layer of coating applied to specific areas such as edges, welds, outside corners, bolt heads and threads, nuts, and crevices, to provide additional barrier protection. The stripe coat may be applied either before or after a layer of coating (often called a "full coat") is applied over the entire surface being coated. The practice of applying a stripe coat is frequently referred to as "striping." The coating manufacturer should be consulted on whether application of a stripe coat is recommended, as well as the thickness of the stripe coat. The project specification should provide detailed instructions on the surfaces to be stripe coated.
