Idealization in Epistemology Daniel Greco, 2023-07-04 It's standard in epistemology to approach questions about knowledge and rational belief using idealized simplified models But while the practice of constructing idealized models in epistemology is old metaepistemological reflection on that practice is not Greco argues that the fact that epistemologists build idealized models isn't merely a metaepistemological observation that can leave first order epistemological debates untouched Rather once we view epistemology through the lens of idealization and model building the landscape looks quite different Constructing idealized models is likely the best epistemologists can do Once one starts using epistemological categories like belief knowledge and confidence the realm of idealization and model building is entered We can object to a model of knowledge by pointing to a better model but in the absence of a better model the fact that a framework for epistemologizing theorizing involves simplifications approximations and other inaccuracies the fact of its status as an idealized model is not in itself objectionable Once we accept that theorizing in epistemological terms is inescapably idealized a number of intriguing possibilities open up Greco defends a package of epistemological views that might otherwise have looked indefensibly dismissive of our cognitive limitations a package according to which we know a
