AP Chapter 12: Sensations and Perception (12.1% of AP Exam)

I don't see this as a chapter to study for the exam, but it's a good idea to read it for the general idea of how the brain processes information. It's a good idea to read it for the general idea of how the brain processes information.

Chapter 12: Sensations and Perception

Psychologists distinguish between the world's physical properties and the brain's interpretation of those properties. The former is called sensation, and the latter is called perception. Sensation is the process of receiving information from the environment, and perception is the process of interpreting that information.
