Dispersion

The phenomenon in which white light splits into its constituent colours is called dispersion.

When an object is placed in front of a convex lens, the light rays from the object are refracted by the lens and converge at a point on the other side of the lens. The light rays from the object are refracted by the lens and converge at a point on the other side of the lens. The light rays from the object are refracted by the lens and converge at a point on the other side of the lens.

Dispersion of white light by a convex lens: When white light is incident on a convex lens, it is dispersed into its constituent colours. The light rays from the object are refracted by the lens and converge at a point on the other side of the lens.
