

UNIT 5

SOUND AND MAGNETISM

5.1 SOUND

Introduction:

Sound is produced due to the vibrations of the body. These vibrations are transferred to the air medium and propagated in all directions in the form of waves. When the vibrational sound waves reach our ear, the diaphragm of the ear vibrates with equal vibrations produced by the body. Hence we are able to hear the sound by the sensation perceived by the nerves of the ear.

The number of vibrations made in one second is known as frequency of the sound. It is expressed in hertz (Hz). The range of the frequency between 20 Hz and 20,000 Hz is the audible range. Human ears cannot respond to the sound below and above this range. In this sense, all vibrating bodies cannot produce audible sound. The vibrations of frequency below 20 Hz are called infrasonic and above 20,000 Hz are called ultrasonic.

Sound is a mechanical wave and hence it requires a medium to propagate. So we can't hear the sound in vacuum. It travels with the velocity of 330 ms^{-1} in air. Sound waves are reflected and refracted like light waves.

Wave motion:

When a stone is thrown on a pond of water, ripples spread out in all directions on the surface of water. The stone disturbs the water medium at one place but the disturbance is transferred in all directions continuously. This continuous movement of the disturbance is called a wave.

If a wave passes in a medium, the particles of the medium vibrate about their mean position. The particles do not move along with the wave, only the vibrations are transferred from one particle to adjacent particle of the medium in the form of energy.

There are two types of wave motion. They are

- 1) Longitudinal wave motion and
- 2) Transverse wave motion

1) Longitudinal wave motion:

If the particles of the medium vibrate parallel to the direction of propagation of the wave, the wave is known as longitudinal wave.

Examples:

1. The propagation of sound in air
2. The propagation of sound in gas
3. The propagation of sound inside the liquid
