—“I want to change things that are not working, making them better. To change, will we not pass. . . . Yes, without a major change in the way all things have been done, the revolution is a halfhearted movement. It has not to be more successful than it is. Making a new way, making power will be what they will want. . . . There is something important. We have to know that something. I am thinking that that is the main thing, trying to understand it and what it means. . . . And the other thing, they are going through it. And maybe that is the answer.” He is not sure of it. He is simply a man who wants to change things that are not working. He wishes to be a student.”
