

prototypes of Masuda's Fu-cho class, and were involved on the Nationalist side in the Spanish Civil War. Also among the considerable range of Italian submarines of the 1920s were the Finote class, medium-to-large boats of 854 tonnes (880 tons) surfaced and 1,675 tonnes (1,818 tons) submerged but with a relatively short range of 9,200km (5,714 miles) at 8 knots.

Giuseppe Bassini, one of the first, launched March 1918, was used as a training ship from 1940-42, when it was converted to an oil bulk. In April 1929, Emme Financiera was launched, a one-off design which incorporated a seaplane hanger as an extension of the conning tower, though a plane was never launched. The similarly craft was laid up in June 1941. A more versatile design was that of the Fuotli Bandiera class, also of 1929, four boats which survived through World War II (engaged on training and transport duties) to be discarded in 1948.

Japan

In accordance with a new naval strategy, Japan's ocean-going boats began to appear from 1913, with I-21 as the first. It was based on Italian drawings of the Fiat-Lauro F1 type. In 1924 its number was altered to RO-2 and a new I-21 was built, based on the design of the German UB-125, which Japan had

a Patrol Boat

Displacement

Like the Finote class, the Fuotli Bandiera boats had to be modified to develop stability problems in heavy seas, which slowed their plans. They were used for training and transport in World War II, and Financiera (later renamed Emme Financiera) was captured and modified to become RO-2, the others were discarded in 1948.

Displacement

Marking the start of the Japanese Navy's interest in ocean-going submarines, built at the Kawasaki Yard in Kobe, I-21 was a single boat for 1913 but was also constructed as a second-class RO type. Its career was relatively brief, being ordered in 1918, in which time Japanese submarine design had made considerable strides.

acquired at the end of the war. The original I-21 was written in 1918. By then, Japanese submarine technology was well embarked on its own unique course. Designers were instructed to work on boats with a high surface speed, able to keep up with a battle fleet or a fast cruiser squadron, and the concept of the 'submarine cruiser' was pursued with maximum enthusiasm at the new Submarine School which had been set up at Kure in 1920.

Japan also played host to several hundred German technicians and naval officers. The RO-2 submarine, completed in 1924, was said to be partly based on the British L-class, but had a double hull, displacing 1,300 tons (1,325 tonnes) surfaced and 2,450 tons (2,665 tonnes) submerged. Its range was a remarkable 37,000km (23,000 miles) but its engines were inadequate. More successful was RO-2, completed in 1925 and based on U-139. Its range was half that of RO-2. It was armed with eight 21in (533mm) torpedoes tubes, 16 torpedoes, and a 4.8in (120mm) deck gun. From 1924 the Imperial Japanese Navy specialised in submarines under the rubric 1 (line-class submarine), RO (medium or coastal submarine), and HA (small or scout type).

US Navy

The United States Navy obtained six U-boats as war prizes in 1919, including U-140, and USN officers quickly found the German vessels superior to American submarines in almost every respect. This discovery came too late to change the currently building S-class, of which no fewer than 31 were launched between 1919 and 1925. Following a basic order for an 800-ton patrol boat, three prototypes were built, of which 31, from the Electric Boat Co., and 33, designed by the USN Bureau of Construction and Repair and built at the Portsmouth Navy Yard, were accepted. 31 was a single-hull design and 25 on this model were built. The others, based on 33, were double-hulled, with the conning tower set distinctly behind the mid-point.

I-1 was one of the first submarines to have retractable bow planes. All the S-class had four forward 21in (533mm) torpedoes tubes, and some had a stern tube. Various deck guns were fitted at different times. In 1925, 37 was experimentally fitted with a cylindrical hanger to hold a partially-dismantled Martin MB-1 seaplane. Despite their shortcomings, more were ordered by 1941, forty-one of the S-boats were still in service in December 1941, in both the Atlantic and Pacific fleets. Six were transferred to Britain's Royal Navy as the Polars in 1942 (one later passed on to the Polish navy and lost through friendly fire) and seven were lost through wreck or enemy action. S-class boats sank fourteen Japanese ships in the Pacific, but by mid-1943 they were relegated to the training role. Wartime alterations included modification of the tower to allow for installation of AA guns, and new sheer structure to accommodate periscopes and masts.

Cruiser submarines form only part of a pattern of design and construction which by the mid-1920s also embraced the more modest objective of improving the small-to-medium size patrol submarine, primarily for work in coastal waters but also as an ocean-going attack boat. Design work was going ahead in several countries including the Netherlands and the recently formed Soviet Russia. A secret German-Russian co-operation agreement was made in 1926, and the drawings for four types, U-105, U-106, U-112 (minelayers) and U-119 (cruiser) were passed on. A six-year programme for 12 submarines was initiated. By 1928 this had been enlarged to 18 large and five small submarines, and Soviet Russia first-run classes, Ekolabnik and Leninsk, evolved from this. In 1930 the makers and salvagers British L-55 was recommended and became an additional tool for Soviet engineers who also had their own submarine tradition to draw on.
