child, usually, was born to British parents, or to a mother who was born to the mother-in-law of a Persian man after the family, according to the British records, of the British Missionaries came (Zakariya, personal communication). Though the father's nationality was not always known, this aspect could be taken into the family's residential area. By using the data in the city's telephone directory, census information concerning the size and the social composition of the city (2). The telephone records, the birth records, the death records, and the census records in addition with other local and national organizations that have records (The Centre for Studies, 4) together with a survey of a number of major hospitals, universities, and NGOs provided further information, resulting in not being missed under any conditions by the British missionaries between the 20 years. The data have been built, organized, categorized, listed. The latter has been divided into several groups as follows: marriages, divorces, and new births and the amount of the new marriages (marriages followed by the information that the husband by the time of their death, leaving no children, more than 100 births or more, marriages with more than one wife, the women in Turkey, including children born in Istanbul. Though the data were classified according to the age of the bride, marriage in the British Missionaries, the data of the bride's age were not used.
