

13 Simulation

13.1 Simulation is a way to model a complex system and study its behavior. It is often used to test a system before it is built or to study its behavior under different conditions. The simulation process involves creating a model of the system and then running the model to see how it behaves. The model can be a simple one or a very complex one, depending on the system being modeled. The simulation can be run on a computer or on a physical system. The results of the simulation can be used to make decisions about the system or to improve its design.
