

SLINGSBY SKYLARK 4

SINGLE-SEAT HIGH-PERFORMANCE SAILPLANE

The Skylark 4 is a development of the Skylark 3P, although the modifications are so numerous that it is virtually a new aircraft.

It retains the wing of the 3P, but the airfoils have been made longer, with a maximum chord of 10 ft. The fuselage is very streamlined, and the pilot sits in a semi-reclining position. The conventional tailplane is replaced by a single vertical fin, wing root and fin. The airframe is made up of the fuselage, the wing and the fin. The airframe is made up of a single light alloy section, the 3P, although the rudder and fin are similar to the 3P. The prototype flew for the first time earlier this year at Luton. Dimensions: span, 30 ft. 8 in.; length, 22 ft. 3 in.

Sailplanes can be launched by three methods—towed up by an aeroplane, winched up on a cable, or towed up by a jet or small truck. Once up, the sail-plane has to rely on warm rising air (thermals) to enable it to soar. The air has to be rising faster than the rate at which the sailplane descends. Thermals usually form a cloud at the top, which makes it easier for the pilot to detect these currents. Once in the thermal, the pilot ascends to the base of the cloud. The entire sequence, he may continue ascending in the cloud, eventually rising out of the top, but the more usual method is, on the crest of the lift before the cloud is reached. The pilot then proceeds to the next cloud and repeats the procedure.

To take advantage of the thermal, the sailplane has to be held in a steep turn (as shown in yellow diagram). Using this method, pilots are able to travel many hundreds of miles from their launching point. The world distance record is over 500 miles, and the altitude record is well over 40,000 ft.
