

CHAPTER 1

INTRODUCTION

The National Electric System is mainly made up of generating plants, Transmission Lines and Power Substations; These play a very important function since they are the entry and exit nodes of the energy packages for their sending over long distances, regulation or distribution.

Power Substations are basically constituted, although not necessarily with all the elements, by:

POWER TRANSFORMERS AND REACTORS

The Transformer is a primary device that, according to its relationship, modifies the electrical parameters, voltage and current, operating as boosters or reducers; The Reactor absorbs the reactants by regulating the voltage, in addition to compensating the transmission lines that, due to their length, generate capacitive reactants.

POWER SWITCHES

It is a primary switching device with interrupting capacity and therefore capable of interrupting a current flow under normal or disturbance conditions in a minimum time.

POTENTIAL TRANSFORMERS

It is a primary device that modifies or reduces the potential to reflect primary conditions and bring it into protection, synchronization and signaling schemes.

POTENTIAL DEVICES

Its function is similar to potential transformers, only that they have an inductive part and a capacitive part where the Oplat coupling can also be connected to the communication channels through the transmission lines.

CURRENT TRANSFORMERS

It is a primary device that modifies or reduces current to reflect primary conditions and convey them to protection and metering schemes.

LIGHTNING ARRESTERS

It is a primary device designed to protect other more delicate or expensive equipment from surges caused by atmospheric discharges, maneuvers, etc.
