#4 Station Task Card

Directions: Read the following article and write a three sentence summary about what you learned from the article.
Applying Integers

It is easy to recognize numbers in the real world. For example, highway hour posted speed limits that are represented by numbers. People who have driven a driver's license understand the system of numbers. They know that if the posted limit is 55 mph and they drive 50 mph, they could be fined. We use numbers in checks and see that in everyday life. There are numbers on doors and buildings that are identification. Maps have numbers to give directions and information. Number integers are included in the set of whole numbers {0, 1, 2, 3, ...}. It is relatively easy to see how positive integers affect the world. The application of negative integers however, may be less obvious.

Applying
In general, negative integers represent decreasing or downward movement, or a loss (or deficit) in the number line. If we are describing a car driving down for a stop sign, the acceleration is represented with a negative value because the speed is decreasing. If you were digging a hole, your depth could be represented using negative integers.

The Temperature

A common example of negative integer usage is the thermometer. Thermometers are similar to number lines, but vertical. They have positive integers above zero and negative integers below zero. Commonly, people measure a temperature of 32°F. People use the number system to measure and represent temperature. For example, if it is 10°F outside, and the temperature drops 20°F, it is now -10°F. If we picture the number line, we see that 10 is 10 units above zero, and -10 is 10 units below zero. The difference between 10 and -10 is 20 units.

in terms of feet. Can you think of other "down" or "loss" situations that can be a plus.
