Three Muscular System Layers

The muscular system's three main muscle categories are skeletal, smooth, and cardiac. Skeletal muscles are used for voluntary movements, such as walking, running, and jumping. Smooth muscles are used for involuntary movements, such as breathing, heart rate, and digestion. Cardiac muscles are used for pumping blood throughout the body. Skeletal muscles are not smooth, smooth muscles are not skeletal, and cardiac muscles are not skeletal.

Skeletal Muscles

Skeletal muscles make up the largest muscle group and are the strongest muscles. Smooth muscles work with skeletal muscles to move bones about joints. Cardiac muscles create movement in the heart, which has two main types: smooth muscle and skeletal muscle. Both skeletal muscles can contract to move bones around joints, except they cannot move them around each other.

Skeletal muscles receive voluntary neurological signals from the brain and receive voluntary commands. They receive the voluntary motor signals from the brain via the nervous system. Smooth muscles receive signals from the brain via the nervous system. Cardiac muscles receive signals from the brain via the nervous system. These signals cause the muscles to contract, which causes the skin, bone, and muscle movements we see as voluntary actions, such as walking, running, and jumping. The signals cause either skin, bone, or muscle contractions that result in movement as a consequence.

Cardiac Muscles

Cardiac muscles are used instead of plain heart's smooth muscle because smooth muscle only follows voluntary signals and does not obey the heart. Cardiac muscles contract involuntarily, receiving signals automatically without voluntary input. This allows the heart to pump blood throughout the body without being controlled by the brain. Cardiac muscles follow no commands from the brain because cardiac muscles are involuntary and do not have voluntary control. However, cardiac muscles receive signals from the brain to regulate the heart's pumping action. Cardiac muscles are smooth, involuntary, and receive signals from the brain to regulate the heart's pumping action.

Smooth Muscle

Smooth muscles allow organs and other mechanisms to function smoothly and effectively because smooth muscles need to function smoothly. Smooth muscles often receive non-voluntary. These non-voluntary signals come from the brain. These signals cause smooth muscles to contract. Smooth muscles always contract to keep organs functioning. Examples include the stomach, intestines, lungs, and bladder. Smooth muscles also help regulate things like breathing, heart rate, and blood pressure.
