

Introduction: Dr. Frances Cole summarizes the study's findings. - Frances Cole's Research Assistant, Dr. Catherine O'Flynn

Background: Most businesses "I know of, with important exceptions like" passed initial sustainability scrutiny earlier. The article highlighted in this article includes: generalization, responsibility, motivation, self-identification, company, self-identification, and generalization. What's the right direction, really? The authors argue that the right direction is to be found in the company's culture.

The study's authors argue a shift in the way companies think about their role in the world is needed. The authors argue that companies should focus on the "bottom line" of the business, not the "top line" of the business. The authors argue that companies should focus on the "bottom line" of the business, not the "top line" of the business. The authors argue that companies should focus on the "bottom line" of the business, not the "top line" of the business.

Conclusion: The authors argue that companies should focus on the "bottom line" of the business, not the "top line" of the business.
