The water pump is a mechanical device that circulates coolant through the engine block and radiator. It is driven by the engine's belt system. The water pump is located at the front of the engine block, near the timing belt. The water pump is a cast iron component with a central shaft and a series of vanes that create a vacuum to draw coolant into the pump. The coolant is then forced out of the pump and into the radiator, where it is cooled by the fan and the air flow. The cooled coolant then returns to the water pump, completing the cycle.
