Thirty market size (> 1 kg in body weight) Arctic char were slaughtered using this method. Ten fish were stunned with the Zephyr and bled out by cutting the gills. Ten fish were stunned with the Zephyr and placed in an ice bath. Ten fish were stunned with the Zephyr using incorrect landmarking (e.g. over the eyes or on the side of the head) and bled out by cutting the gills.

In all cases, following being stunned with the Zephyr, the body of the fish became stiff, followed by uncoordinated body movements. Following the killing step, all fish were decapitated using a knife to remove the head from the body. The knife was used to cut a cross section of the brain to assess physical damage. In all 30 fish, physical damage and hemorrhaging was observed in brain.

Fish were filleted by hand and the fillet quality was assessed visually. Bleeding and blood stains were observed in the muscle tissue of fillets from 6 out of 10 fish slaughtered using the Zephyr/ice bath method. Bleeding and blood stains were not observed in fillets from fish that were bled by cutting the gills.

Conclusions

Body stiffness and uncoordinated body movements with a lack of elicitable reflexes suggests that all fish were effectively stunned using the Zephyr captive bolt pistol. The physical damage and hemorrhaging observed in brain suggests that the fish were killed instantly from massive brain trauma. Despite the evidence which suggests that the use of the Zephyr captive resulted in rapid death, a secondary kill step is recommended as it is very challenging to confirm death in a slaughter environment while processing large numbers of animals.

Bleeding and blood stains in fillets from fish slaughtered using the Zephyr/ice bath method suggest that the act of exsanguination during slaughter improves fillet quality. In terrestrial livestock species, rapid hypoxia from exsanguination leads to quick entry into rigor mortis and a more rapid pH change within the muscle to make a better quality, longer lasting food product.

In conclusion, it was found that the Zephyr captive bolt combined with a secondary kill step, such as exsanguination, is an effective way to humanely slaughter market size salmonid fishes. Exsanguination was more effective than rapid chilling in terms of product quality. This slaughter method is only viable for small to medium size aquaculture producers. Due to manual labour requirements, it is suggested that large scale growers should investigate commercially available equipment to help automate the slaughter process. Compared to commercially available slaughter equipment which may cost hundreds of thousands of dollars, this is custom made food grade device paired with a Zephyr captive bolt pistol is a fairly low-cost humane slaughter solution and can be replicated for less than $5,000.
