

Communication and Coordination

Siloed working and lack of coordination between services

Lack of tools to support communication and coordination between different health professionals.

Lack of or inappropriate use of resources

No clear pathway for FND and a lack of knowledge amongst health professionals around services available, which make referrals challenging.

Clear and Joined up Pathway

Dualistic services

Dualistic nature of health services (physical and mental health managed separately) does not reflect the lived experiences of people living with FND, and makes balancing physical and psychological rehab difficult.

There is a lack of resources and shortage of staff with interest in FND.

Risk of increased referral from primary to secondary care due to lack of time

Large case loads make prioritising difficult for health professionals.

Limitation on time with patients - approx. 15 mins as a GP, 30 mins as a consultant.

Managing complex patients can be difficult alongside other clinical priorities.

Lack of time to provide tailored and consistent care

It takes time with patients to build rapport and trust, manage expectations and difficult emotions, in order to make progress towards managing the condition.

Consistency of care is challenging due to time constraints and competing demands on health professionals.

Getting to know the person and the impact of FND on them takes time.

Spectrum of patients ranging from mild to severe, require different approaches to care.

Approach of the service does not meet needs of FND patient as there is a push to get everyone through rehab, but timing is important for the person to benefit from it.

If the person does not accept their FND diagnosis, subsequent interventions (e.g. rehab, therapy, equipment) may not be effective and will be a drain on limited resources available.

Understanding needs of people living with FND

Health professionals' understanding of FND

A lack of confidence amongst staff when working with people with FND due to lack of knowledge about the condition.

Need for a better understanding of FND, particularly in primary care and community settings.

Understanding FND

Knowing the patient's understanding of their diagnosis and the condition.

Due to the stigma around mental health services, health professionals spend a lot of time convincing patients of benefits, but often patients may still not engage with the service.

Fragmented services and information resources can drive patients to social media for information which may not be appropriate.
