Abstract

Abstract: Streptococcus pneumoniae is a leading cause of death in children worldwide. In the United States, pneumococcal conjugate vaccine (PCV) is recommended for all children under 2 years of age. PCV is also recommended for children with certain medical conditions, including "functional asplenia." Splenic dysfunction is a common complication of sickle cell disease (SCD), and children with SCD are at increased risk for invasive pneumococcal infection. The purpose of this study was to determine the prevalence of splenic dysfunction in children with SCD and to assess the impact of PCV on the risk of invasive pneumococcal infection in this population. A retrospective cohort study was conducted in a tertiary care children's hospital. All children with SCD who were born between 1990 and 2000 and who had a documented splenic ultrasound examination between 1995 and 2000 were included in the study. The prevalence of splenic dysfunction was determined by the presence of an enlarged spleen on ultrasound examination. The impact of PCV on the risk of invasive pneumococcal infection was assessed by comparing the incidence of invasive pneumococcal infection in children with SCD who had received PCV to the incidence in children with SCD who had not received PCV. The results of the study showed that the prevalence of splenic dysfunction in children with SCD was 45%. The incidence of invasive pneumococcal infection was significantly lower in children with SCD who had received PCV compared to children with SCD who had not received PCV. These findings suggest that PCV may be beneficial in reducing the risk of invasive pneumococcal infection in children with SCD, even in the presence of splenic dysfunction.
