Background: Multiple health-care organizations and programs worldwide have been able to reduce or even eliminate the use of unsafe injection practices. Such programs have been successful in reducing the risk of blood-borne virus transmission, including HIV, hepatitis B, and hepatitis C. However, the impact of such programs on the risk of hepatitis A virus (HAV) transmission has not been well studied. The purpose of this study was to determine the impact of a needle and syringe exchange program (NSEP) on the risk of HAV transmission.
